

Moosecrunchers halftime report

Our process so far and ongoing is that we all meet in real life every Wednesday 9-12. We start with a stand up meeting where everyone tell the group what they've been doing for the last week and how they've been doing. Everyone also have to talk about how they've felt the last week regarding stress and schoolwork and how their schedule looks the incoming week. When the first round is done the Scrum Master leads a discussion where new goals for the next sprint are set up and other project matters are discussed.

The product vision is pretty clear and we're all agreed on the products functionality and how we want the two interfaces to look. The technical details and how the vision is going to be carried out depends a bit on the functionality that the Android API and the Google Maps API gives us. Right now we're aiming to be able to send just the coordinates for the new route which would be much more efficient in terms of data traffic. Otherwise we'll try to send a route via Google maps or in the worst case we'll send a screenshot of the map. The Android Studio has been willing to cooperate with us this far and not any remarkable problems have occurred.

We've spoken to a traffic planner at Keolis about who between the traffic leader and the bus driver that has the knowledge advantage. He also gave us a great answer about what degrees of freedom the bus driver has regarding reroutes. He also told us about the routines and protocol that Keolis have set up when reroutes occurs and how the bus drivers are supposed to act. He was very excited about our product and said that they had discussed a similar product but they had never done something about it.

The group dynamics work fine and everyone in the group have an understanding for each other's situation. This far we haven't been full team the whole time because 4 out of 6 people have been very busy with the Cortège and the FestU party. Still with those two events over everyone seems willing to spend the time needed to create a great product.

In common the group has high ambitions and everyone has had the possibility to tell their expectations of the course and of the group and tell their personal target with the course. A social contract has also been set up.
